

On personality, vulnerability and infertility

“You will see that the evils that devour men are the fruit of their choice and that these unhappy ones seek out far away the benefit from what they are the source”

Pitagoras

The persons who are unable to get pregnant, despite the relative youth and the many attempts, are not few. Their clinical history often reveals that at least one partner has shown little ability to adapt to the environment in which he has chosen or is forced to live. This is especially true in women who work outside the home and play a role not traditionally typically female. In some other more rare occasion you get the impression that particularly vulnerable are those with a low sense of morality (Check the link "Autonomic Nervous System and Reproduction" and the "Final Thoughts" section of this site).

In fact

Infertility often reflects a vulnerability and an obvious relationship with the individual's personality, lifestyle, stress and behavior.

The vulnerability can be congenital or acquired, and mainly affects the emotional personality of the individual. Emotional states, such as anxiety, depression, fear, panic, etc., can alone be the cause of infertility of the couple and can even cause structural damage of the reproductive organs. (For details see the link "Emotion to infertility").
